The aircraft is designed to be powered by engines from either a two-stroke or four stroke motor and features larger landing gear and a longer tail than the Poseidon 300. Design and development The 500 was designed to be powered by a four-stroke engine or a two-stroke engine of the same power rating. The fuselage is made from Kevlar and the wings from aluminum honeycombed spar. The pilot's cockpit, wheel pants and windscreen are manufactured from GRP. The control surfaces are fully adjustable and are fabric covered, as is the rear fuselage. The cowling is GRP with a Kevlar leading edge. The wings fold for storage and for transport. The landing gear features an unsprung nosewheel and main wheel and a taildragger with steel tube spars and main spar. The fuselage has a steel tube semi-monocoque (honeycombed) structure with a reinforced steel tube cockpit pod under the wings. Construction and finish of all parts are durable, as they have to withstand the rough use of the dirtbike pilot. The aircraft is used as a firefighting trainer and is also used to rescue paragliders that have become stranded. It was the first homebuilt aircraft to reach production status in New Zealand. Variants Poseidon 500 5-place open cockpit, engine, winglets optional. Introduced 1977, with prototype built in 1976. Poseidon 500 M 5-place open cockpit, engine, small winglets. Introduced 1981.
