The binding of lysozyme to an octadecyl-modified silica surface at pH 2 and pH 7 was studied at a constant protein/solution interface and as a function of the protein concentration, ionic strength, protein incubation time, and buffer type. Both binding and dissociation were clearly influenced by the pH, indicating the presence of an activated complexation process. Binding at pH 2 and pH 7 was determined by a rate equation, and we found that both the reaction rate constant and the maximum number of binding sites depended on the ionic strength of the solution. Furthermore, binding at pH 7 was markedly faster than at pH 2. Binding at both pH values was reversible and could be described by the Langmuir adsorption isotherm and by the Hofmeister effect. The influence of protein desorption on the subsequent adsorption was studied as a function of protein concentration, ionic strength, and buffer type. Favorable protein adsorption was observed in the presence of Na₂SO₄ at pH 2 and in the presence of K₂SO₄ at pH 7. A general trend for ionic strength and buffer type was observed by which the
