What do you think?The real achalasia: long-term follow-up of achalasia. Seventy-six patients with achalasia of the esophagus seen in the previous 20 years were reviewed. The clinical presentation, diagnosis, therapeutic modalities, and results with long-term follow-up are described. Clinical follow-up was as complete as possible in 61 patients. Thirty-four (55%) of the 61 patients had radiographically documented evidence of esophageal remodeling with loss of the "signet ring" appearance. There was no significant difference in the disease course and the clinical and radiographic course of achalasia between patients with and without persistent esophageal remodeling. The data support the concept that esophageal remodeling may represent an adaptive response to esophageal distension in achalasia and that remodeling of the lower esophageal sphincter may be more common than previously thought.The effects of two different chewing sticks on masticatory performance. To test the hypothesis that a chewing stick of low hardness would lead to less masticatory performance than a chewing stick of higher hardness. Forty young healthy adult subjects, 20 males and 20 females, were given 3 testing periods in order to compare the effects of a chewing stick of low hardness (Vibram(®) Super Carb Comfort, Vernier) to those of a chewing stick of higher hardness (Vibram(®) Flex 10, Vernier). The test period lasted 30 minutes and consisted of successive chewing and swallowing periods. The parameters considered were number of repetitions, duration and number of swallows. Number of repetitions and total duration were significantly increased when a chewing stick was employed. No significant differences were observed between the sticks in the other parameters. The use of chewing sticks affected masticatory performance. Masticatory activity, which was characterized by a large number of repetitions and a longer duration of chewing and swallowing actions, occurred when a chewing stick was applied.Q: Real time performance improvement on all methods in C++ I am currently porting a big project from C to C++ and I have to make the performance of a large part of the code (i.e. ~70%) faster. The problem is, I don't know what I am doing with C++ which could not be done with C (or viceversa). I want to know: What is the fastest way to make a method
