This study addresses the question of whether the concentration of fluoride in plasma, urine and teeth relates to skeletal fluoride contents. Plasma fluoride and urinary fluoride were significantly correlated with bone fluoride contents. The proximal carpal bone showed the highest fluoride levels. However, the correlation with urinary and plasma fluoride was stronger when the fluoride levels in the bones were expressed as fluoride concentrations or as fluoride/Ca values. This was expressed more clearly when the fluoride levels in the bones were corrected for the fluoride content in the different Ca salts. Bone fluoride levels are mainly determined by the calcium content of the respective Ca salt. With respect to the relation between skeletal fluoride levels and bone mineral content, however, the correlation was weaker than that with urinary and plasma fluoride levels. When plasma fluoride was corrected for the calcium in the alkaline phosphatase fraction and urinary fluoride for the calcium in creatinine, no significant correlation could be found, and bone fluoride levels did not correlate with bone mineral
