We have 3 phase 115 VAC main service coming into the building from a large transformer station, and we use the 3-phase service to power 3 loads, 1 of those loads powered by our son's electrical keyboard that he uses at work, it works fine, but he's annoyed about pulling a whole outlet from the wall so he asked us, if possible, to run the same circuit on a smaller sub-panel (like a switchgear subpanel) where he would have the flexibility to choose which outlet he would plug into depending on the circuit he needs to run, like with a normal outlet you can plug your other peripherals or other electronics into the same outlet, and we were looking for something like that, is it possible to do that? If so, how do you connect the sub-panel? For further info, we are using a sub-panel with this setup: And 3 phase 115 VAC service coming into this sub-panel like this: EDIT: More detailed info. We already had a sub-panel, and we were planning on using a 12-slot panel, with 4 x 12/2G (19.2A) outlet, and 2x 4/2 G (19.2A) outlet, like this: All 4 x 12/2G outlets are connected to three different circuits, the 1st and 2nd circuit runs along with the main service coming from transformer, the 3rd has its own isolated service coming from transformer. The 4th outlet is connected to a 3-phase 115 VAC sub-panel and it's load, the load has several small appliances like this All the appliances above has its own sub-panel and power source, if we were to connect the two sub-

Mac OS Version: .New commands for the Trump administration are so very welcome. Jeff Sessions' move to end the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) program, even at midnight, was entirely predictable. The possibility of a crackdown on Cuban immigrants is the more interesting one. Cuba, you see, has been not only softening its relations with the U.S. by opening up communications with the island, as President Trump had demanded, but also serving as an interesting foil to that diplomatic outreach. Cuba has openly supported Venezuela and denounced U.S. foreign policy and meddling there. Now, according to a Washington Post report, Havana is leaning toward re-introducing a program allowing its citizens to travel to the U.S., and is urging the Venezuelan government to take up discussions to normalize relations. In March, as part of its good-will measures aimed at gaining President Trump's approval, the government of Cuba announced the reinstatement of the program. At the time, it seemed to be an open question whether it would be exercised – or if it was, whether Trump would go along with it. After all, he had been hostile to some of the beneficiaries of the program. He had publicly defended the parents of a deceased Cuban defector, Ana Belén Montes, who was in fact from Honduras, and complained at a rally that the mother's petition for asylum was being handled in a "horrendous" way. And there had been hard-liners, like incoming Secretary of State Mike Pompeo, who argued that President Obama's move had made it too easy for Cubans to defect. In any case, Trump's tone softened, and Pompeo's antagonism lessened. It remained to be seen, though, if the shifting position would gain Trump's personal approval. Well, it appears it has. Last week, President Trump informed the foreign policy directors of the NFL and NBA that they were prohibited from visiting Cuba to hold a series of events celebrating the 50th anniversary of the revolution. The administration had argued that the events constituted a violation of Cuba's "highly restrictive" travel policy. The directors had countered that they were, in fact, held in Havana to commemorate the 82138339de
