Tuesday, October 22, 2010 Assume you have purchased a new laptop recently, and suddenly, it will not display a menu of Windows to start the system. You may encounter a situation where Windows doesn't display a screen when you are at the login page, or after you reboot the computer. To resolve the problem, you will need to go to the boot menu of your computer. You can easily remove the partition that has a number of boot entries (such as XP, Vista, etc.), and then restore the default entry. This is a simple and convenient method to solve the problem, and will not affect the computer. If you want, you can ask a professional for professional services. In the screenshot below, it is difficult to see the existing partition, and there are many entries in the boot menu.
