What's New In?

cFosSpeed has been designed to make the internet look more like a tamable beast, rather than something that is out of reach as an end user. This is basically a network traffic manager app that has been designed to make sure you're getting the best connection possible on your network, even when nothing more is needed. It makes the internet look like a more tamable beast rather than something that is out of your reach as an end user. It's not one of those simple tools that promise you hard-to-confirm network speeds. In fact, this app doesn't promise an increase in speed per se, but more stability and control over your network and how it acts in certain scenarios. The app that looks like a wizard The app itself looks like a wizard setup process, meaning you'll most likely have to go through each of the steps to configure your network behavior. Start with the Preferences tab and continue with Protocols, Programs, Current Connections, and Ping Statistics. Lastly, check on the Usage Graph to understand when your network is needed the most and how much pressure is put on it in those moments. Each new network you connect to will require a new setup procedure. Thus, no two networks will share the same settings. Prioritize app access for internet speed The most problematic of the issues nowadays is that almost all programs use the internet, ergo your network for something. In such situations, the user is ultimately forced to close or reset the connection. cFosSpeed offers another solution, prioritizing your connected apps in order for your network to be more stable. The main idea is to set lower priorities for apps dealing with a lot of data for no reason and allow a higher ranking for those you use or need to have running with the best connection possible. cFosSpeed is an application dedicated to those individuals looking to have the best possible options on the table when it comes to controlling your network in order to gain more stability and some speed when you need it the most, avoiding any possible jams or general issues when it comes to your connections.
