Carotenoid-rich fruits, vegetables, and plant-derived products have been shown to reduce cancer incidence. The diverse molecular mechanisms of action of these compounds remain to be elucidated. We used pig skin and liver as biological target tissues in an Affymetrix gene profiling array analysis to gain a global view of the gene-specific effects of a commonly used agent in chemoprevention, the carotenoid β -carotene. Each of two different doses, 0.5% (w/w) and 1% (w/w) of β -carotene (BC) were compared with a solvent control.
