The incision was also smaller in the second patient than in the first patient. This result could be due to the surgical skill of the surgeon. To conclude, the multimodal treatment of recurrent hernia and infection is effective in cases where surgical intervention is possible. Since a single modality approach for recurrent hernia is not an effective treatment, combined surgical treatment should be performed as soon as possible after the first operation. Although it is difficult to accurately judge when the recurrence of the internal ring begins, clinical evaluation, change in the position of the intestine and manual reduction are valuable diagnostic methods for the pre-operative evaluation of patients suspected of having a recurrent hernia. For future research, we will perform a prospective randomised controlled study of the multimodal treatment of recurrent hernia to compare the efficacy of this method with the conventional surgical treatment of recurrent hernia. The follow-up period in our study was relatively short, and we could not accurately analyse the risk factors for recurrent hernia. The use of an eligible comparison group is necessary to further evaluate whether this method is effective for recurrent hernia. In addition, the definition of recurrent hernia should be standardized in future studies.

Conclusions {#Sec5} ===== The findings of our study suggest that the multimodal treatment of recurrent hernia is effective as a minimally invasive approach. Combined surgical treatment for recurrent hernia should be performed as soon as possible after the first operation. The multimodal treatment is helpful when surgery is not possible.
