car company that still had its sights set high. It was in 1933 that the Crosley Sportster was designed and constructed by first year employee G.A. "Jake" Miller at the Crosley Automobile Company's plant in Flint, Michigan. In 1934 the company bought out the rights to its first car by David Crosley. It was then renamed the "Miller-Crosley-Bates" and sent out to dealerships with a sales price of $570.00. It was a small, light, two-seater sports car that was powered by a 114 cubic-inch "Carsco" engine, rated at about 32 horsepower. The car had a standard 4.95-inch rear axle, drum brakes on the wheels, and a hefty 925 pounds of curb weight. Although the Sportster was intended to be driven on the road, it was not a pleasant ride in a car with an uncoated floor. The rear end would often catch fire when hit, and the seat was a difficult one to deal with when jostled. The steering wheel was no better, turning so stiffly and the clutch so tight that the owner would have to grab the brake lever to start the engine. The brakes were not powerful and could be held on by the wrist. The rest of the car - in the rear, at least - was made of high-grade steel. The entire car had a polished and buffed-out metal finish. The chrome and aluminum trim pieces added up to over $1,000 in the late 1930s, and kept the price of the car just a bit over $1,500. Despite these shortcomings, the Sportster was first to be exported to Europe. It was on hand when General de Gaulle was given the keys to
