In this study, the gas-phase and liquid-phase electronic structures of the trimethyltin(II) chloride dimer, TMTCl₂, have been investigated with two high-level ab initio methods, the multiconfigurational perturbation theory and the CCSD(T)-F12b, the coupled cluster with singles and doubles and perturbative triples calculations with the full electron correlation treatment. The results show that the gas-phase electronic structure of the TMTCl₂ molecule has a single closed-shell electronic structure and only one configuration exists in this closed shell. The carbon and chlorine atoms are found to be negatively charged. The liquid-phase electronic structure of the TMTCl₂ molecule is studied by a multiconfigurational thermal-assisted pair functional method. The single closed-shell electronic structure of TMTCl₂ and the positive charge on the carbon atoms are also well reproduced. The accurate calculation results suggest that the TMTCl₂ can be efficiently generated from the cryogenic matrix isolation via the thorium effusion cell and the cold laser ablation processes. The reaction dynamics for the TMTCl₂ thermal decomposition are also investigated. At the end of all this, we're left with a lively, dangerous book that resembles an 0cc13bf012
