Zombie Apocalypse: How To Unlock All Dead Target Games It is when a Microsoft security feature makes a determination that your password file may have been compromised. But this article just give another reason to stick with strong and complex password. Some ideas to get you started: The password should be at least eight characters long. It should contain numbers and special characters. It should not be a word in the dictionary, such as: qwerty. It should not be simply a name, such as: qwerty123. The password should not be the answer to a question, such as: test. The password should not contain a sentence, such as: qwerty1, as it is easy for an attacker to guess. Notice: wordpress is known to have a vulnerability related to preventing back-door access with password, also known as 'back-door'. If you are planning on installing WordPress by a self-hosted theme, ensure that the site has a strong and unique password for your wp-admin user. And if you are planning on updating your theme, WordPress has a documentation to keep users up-to-date on the latest changes related to hacking and exploiting of vulnerabilities. A: From a developer's perspective, your words are "garbage". One of the primary reasons why you would use a database of passwords is to allow applications to log you in with them. And then we have a built in mechanism for forgetting these (silly) passwords once they are logged in. What's the worst that happens? Someone gets their hands on your database. How often does that happen? That's easy, almost never. Which has the nice added benefit that the passwords may be more or less secure. Also, there's no reason you need to store the password as plain text. It's simply not the right way to do things. There are myriad ways to encrypt the information, creating multiple potential paths to exploit the stored data. As for all the other security measures...I could spend hours explaining why the need them. Suffice to say, though, that the site is probably well secured. You've listed the user/admin account's credentials, and now you're fretting about the user's credential that they'll use to log into the login screen (which, when I think about it, isn't really what you're worried about. It's the system that the user
