This Game Is Cracked And Highly Compressed Game.Q: Create a new C#.Net Framework class as a DLL I've been playing around with writing a C# DLL class for creating test emails (as part of a larger application, the main application doesn't use emails at all). I've written this class, and it works really nicely in my project. But I don't think I can keep it in my project - I think the DLL would need a reference to the .NET Framework, which I don't want to include. What I'd like to do is make an EXE or DLL that contains the new email class. The reason I don't want to use the SDK, is that it offers really nice features, like the MailMessage constructor accepting account credentials, which the email class doesn't provide in my class. So far I've not been able to find a way of doing this. I have a main project in VS2010, and this DLL is a separate project within the solution. I've added it as a reference to the main project in Visual Studio, but this allows me to use the DLL classes in the main project. However, if I reference the DLL project, and include the .NET Framework reference in the DLL project (as I described), it isn't possible to use any of the classes from the main project (it complains that it can't find the required framework assembly). I could always write a simple 'main' class for the DLL that calls into the main project, but I'm sure there has to be an easier way! Does anyone have any ideas? Many Thanks, A: I agree with the comment above by Brad - I'd recommend using the SMTP client libraries from the .NET Framework instead. Once you have the SMTP client libraries installed into your project, creating a MailMessage from the client libraries is a lot easier than creating it from scratch. A few links: The .NET Framework's SMTP client libraries Configuring/Using the .NET Framework's SMTP Client Libraries In case you are looking for something even easier than client libraries, I wrote a library which wraps the SMTP client libraries. It's about as simple as it gets for creating MIME mail, and it might also help you with sending directly from an email client - I
