[Indices of antioxidant activity and lipid peroxidation of blood serum in patients with chronic obstructive bronchitis under adenocarcinoma of the lung]. In a prospective study of 47 patients with chronic obstructive bronchitis in acute phase of developing adenocarcinoma of the lung, a number of indices of antioxidant activity (FRAP, dPAP) and lipid peroxidation (MDA) were measured in blood serum. Correlation analysis revealed dependence of blood serum antioxidant activity on fat metabolism indices, systemic inflammation and development of diabetes mellitus in patients with obstructive bronchitis and lung cancer. The data acquisition is conducted in random order, and thus, reduces the time of the experiment which is noted as the higher R2-black\ tea~ (0.87) compared to R2-roobos\ tea~ (0.61) and R2-regular\ tea~ (0.52). This is interesting for the application of the test as part of a clinical protocol and for the assessment of methods during field studies. Conclusion {#Sec12} ===== Based on the results obtained in the study, the field-based analysis of the urinary samples from patients with colon cancer is feasible. This finding opens doors for further studies on this subject, that could for example involve the assessment of the biomarkers as potential indicators of the disease, the study of the interaction between, and correlation between, urinary biomarkers and colorectal cancer, and the development of sample-to-sample based algorithms for the detection of colon cancer. The tests could be used in other fields of health, for example in the area of biochemical analysis, where samples are easier to obtain compared to fecal samples, and samples from other test areas, such as the urinary tract, are accepted as adequate for the analysis of biological markers.
